Key Takeaways for Retail Security Vigilance:

- Improve your security controls through education about common methods of data compromise. In the retail space, according to a recent report from security firm Bitglass, 59 percent of hackers identify phishing as the preferred method for data exfiltration. Threat intelligence can go a long way in the detection of unauthorized and suspicious activity, so retailers can respond and mitigate threats.
- Most retail breaches in recent years were due to point of sale (POS) compromise and exploitation of zero-day vulnerabilities. Digital cash registers are often the target of malware designed to steal credit card numbers. To minimize the potential for a breach, businesses that give remote access to their point of sale system can consider installing two-factor authentication and move to end-to-end encryption of customers' data throughout the entire payment process, including the moment the credit card is swiped.
- Remember the basics comprehensive patch management review should be a priority to keep retail systems and servers protected against software vulnerabilities ripe for compromise.
